

IMAGES: COPYRIGHT AND FAIR USE

ALL authors must guarantee that the materials submitted to the publishing house are free of any form of copyright, i.e. that they have requested and obtained all the appropriate legal permissions to use and publish the aforesaid materials before their submission.

With regard to copyright regulations for texts or images, please note the following:

- in order to reprint a text, or part of a text, it is necessary to wait 70 years after the death of the author;
- in order to be able to publish images of archaeological or manuscript material, or other material belonging to an institution, there are no time constraints, i.e. the author must always obtain, and if necessary, pay for, publication rights.

These rules vary from time to time, depending on the subject and ownership of the image itself. For example, if the image depicts an archaeological find, it is the museum where the image is kept, that will have to grant permission to use the photograph taken by the author (even if the image has already been published elsewhere), or, possibly, to provide the author with rights to use its own archive's image instead.

The copyright, provenance, and ownership of the image must always be expressed within the article, usually in special sections at the beginning or end of the article, or in the text of the individual captions. Often it is the body/institution owning the image itself that indicates the specific sentence to be inserted in the caption.

As far as the quality of the images is concerned, they must have a resolution of at least 300 DPI and a base size of 18 cm; they must be sent not within the text but in separate files, possibly in TIF format or, alternatively, in JPEG format but without any type of compression.
